How Jaqui Smith supports sex trafficking¹

Jaqui Smith, is trying to get the maximum personal publicity by making buying sex illegal, "to clamp down on sex trafficking". But she as Home Secretary carries most of the responsibility for the fact that there is sex trafficking at all. She and only she could make our police enforce the enormously powerful laws that already exist. She and only she could stop enforcing laws in a way that supports the sex trafficking mafia.

Trafficking could be wiped out in months. All that is needed is for the police to make surprise visits to brothels. If there is any indication that women are working against their wills, invoke all the laws. Rape, assault, kidnapping, wrongful imprisonment, supply of drugs, allowing drugs to be used on the premises, immigration offences, theft of passports, keeping a disorderly house, living off immoral earnings, breach of health and safety regulations, breach of fire regulations, breaches of the Factories Act, failure to display the details of the company, failure to keep VAT and Tax records, failure to pay national insurance of employers and contractors (IR35), tax evasion, selling alcohol without a licence, right down to allowing smoking in a place of entertainment. And any self-respecting policeman could produce a dozen more offences.

Trafficking immediately becomes unprofitable, and some of the worst aspects of the sex trade vanish immediately.

But convictions on the serious offences demand that the victims give evidence. Jaqui Smith and previous Home Secretaries have made quite sure that they do not dare, and that sympathetic clients will not go to the police. Many of these women have been kidnapped, raped and beaten up repeatedly to break their will, then made drug addicts. Many are virtual prisoners. All to serve British clients and the traffickers Jaqui Smith refuses to imprison. But Jaqui and previous Home Secretaries do not compensate the victims: they deport them. In their home countries they are brutally punished by the sex mafia, and then they find they are social outcasts, and their only hope of survival is to beg to be trafficked again.
